This course investigates the ways that foreign policy is made in different interpersonal, organizational, national, and international contexts. Within each of these "contexts," this course focuses explicitly on the foreign policy making process. Its objective is to introduce a range of theories that seek to explain how decision makers formulate and implement their policy goals. The course begins with a series of micro-theoretical approaches to foreign policy decision making; the second part of the course then considers different structural constraints on policy making. Each of these approaches is comparative in perspective, focusing on generalized theory pertinent to foreign policy in different regions of the world.

Course Requirements

As in any graduate seminar, active participation is essential. Required readings, indicated by an asterisk (*) on the syllabus, should always be completed before class. As a prelude to each week's discussion, students should be prepared to summarize the central points of each required reading.

The course requires two brief (about 4 pages) review essays summarizing scholarly work on a topic relevant to the course (more details will be provided in class). A review essay is not a book report: it should summarize the reviewed work only as necessary. Its objective is to state your own, original argument (reacting to the argument in the reviewed work). The review essays and all other written work for this class must be typed and double-spaced with one-inch margins. No written work will be accepted by email. Your work should conform stylistically to the standards of a prominent international relations journal (such as International Organization or International Studies Quarterly). Style manuals such as Kate Turabian's Manual for Writers of Term Papers, Theses, and Dissertations or William Strunk and E. B. White's The Elements of Style may also be helpful. Papers should also conform to university and professional standards for academic honesty and integrity (review the relevant sections of the Student Handbook).

The course also requires a series of policy reports (most will be very short—one or two pages), which will describe aspects of the foreign policy making process in a country chosen at the beginning of the semester (not the United States). Each policy report assignment will be distributed in class, and the report will be due at the beginning of the following class (or as noted in the assignment). In producing these reports, be certain to document all sources meticulously.

All written work is due at the beginning of class on the assigned dates. Late papers will be accepted only at the professor's discretion and will be penalized. Grades will be determined on the basis of these course requirements as follows:

Participation	10%
First Review Essay	25%
Second Review Essay	25%
Policy Reports	40%

You are always welcome to discuss this course or other academic issues with me during my office hours. I will also be happy to make an appointment for another time if you cannot see me during office hours. Don't hesitate to ask if you have any questions or problems.
